

INTRODUCTION

The legislature didn't skip a beat getting back to work after returning from their "spring break." Many committees had packed-full agendas, full of mostly noncontroversial bills and also local bills. One notable bill that quickly swept through the House was House Bill 334, Temporarily Align Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) Treatment to Federal Treatment. Typically, loans are considered taxable income, but this bill would align North Carolina with 47 other states and the federal government by providing businesses a tax deduction for expenses they paid using forgiven PPP loans. This program was a part of the CARES Act last year and was aimed at helping struggling businesses continue to keep their employees on the payroll. The bill passed the House with a nearly unanimous vote of 111-2. Republican Reps. George Cleveland and Julia Howard were the only no votes. In an unusual twist, the long time Chair of the House Finance Committee, Rep. Julia Howard, publicly criticized the Speaker and other Republican Leadership in the House for supporting the bill if their businesses received PPP Loans. This despite a determination that it was not a conflict of interest and that many issues may impact legislators and their businesses, but as long as not targeted to them specifically generally there is no conflict. It will be interesting to see how this conflict plays out.

HOUSE BILL 73, TEMPORARILY DEFER ABC PERMIT RENEWAL FEES

House Bill 73, Temporarily Defer ABC Permit Renewal Fees, also made its rounds. Sen. Chuck Edwards changed the House version of the bill in the Senate Commerce and Insurance earlier this month. As a reprieve from the pandemic's impact on restaurants and bars, the House version would have allowed businesses to get a year's alcohol sales permit for free, for the period between May and April 2021. Sen. Edwards changed the fee waiver to simply an extended deadline, providing that businesses had until September 1st to pay their annual permit fee. Sen. Edwards said the House sponsors agreed to the change, and that this would give lawmakers time to "look at what other options we have to help the businesses that have been affected by this." However, when the bill was passed with this change in the Senate and sent over to the House for concurrence, bill sponsor Rep. Tim Moffitt asked the House to fail to concur with the Senate's Committee Substitute. Rep. Moffitt explained that the bill was sent over to the Senate as a good bill, but did not return in the same shape. The House unanimously voted not to concur with the Senate's changes to the bill.

BUSINESSES SPEAK OUT

Corporate America has joined the fight on voting legislation throughout the nation. Companies like Amazon, Google, Starbucks, and Netflix have released public statements against “any discriminatory legislation” that would restrict voter access. This is a direct result of numerous voting-related bills being filed throughout the country by Republican legislators who claim our election process needs a shake-up to restore voter confidence after the 2020 election. The start of corporate pressure on voting rights began in Georgia, where a newly passed election bill resulted in various companies speaking out and businesses going elsewhere. Major League Baseball has pulled the All-Star Game from Atlanta, Apple announced they will produce their movie “Emancipation” with Will Smith in another state, and scores of businesses including Delta airlines went on record denouncing the actions of the legislature. This pressure has carried on into other states which are also considering bills that could restrict voter access, including Florida, Michigan and Arizona.

In North Carolina, various bills have been filed that voting rights advocates argue would result in voter suppression. Senate Bill 326, Election Integrity Act, is the only one that has gained enough traction to be heard in a committee. The bill was heard for discussion only in Senate Redistricting and Elections, and is sponsored by the three chairmen of that committee: Sens. Hise, Newton, and Warren. The bill would move up the mail-in absentee ballot deadline to two weeks prior to the election, currently it is 7 days prior. It would also provide that all ballots must be received by close of business (5:00 p.m.) on Election Day, or they will not be counted. Currently, the law provides for a three-day grace period if the absentee ballot is postmarked on or before Election Day. Finally, the bill would provide funds for a mobile ID unit to offer IDs to eligible voters in need of identification to participate in our elections. Currently, the North Carolina constitutional amendment passed by voters to require identification at the polls is being held up in the courts. This bill has not been placed on the calendar since the first discussion, and no other elections-related bill has moved in this state either.

US SENATE RACE

The race is on for Republican US Senator Richard Burr’s seat in 2022. Since Sen. Burr announced his plans for retirement, there has been a lot of discussion and speculation around who all will run for this seat, the first US Senate seat vacancy in North Carolina since 2008. The stakes are high given that the US Senate is currently evenly divided between parties, with Democratic Vice President Kamala Harris breaking the tie. With such close numbers, the winner of North Carolina’s US Senate seat could be a game-changer in 2022, tipping the scale in favor of one party to have greater control of the Senate. With a lot at stake and a rare opening for a US Senate seat, many people have thrown their hat in the ring or are still strongly considering it. This week, former NC Governor Pat McCrory announced his run for US Senate. News also broke this week about Lieutenant Governor Mark Robinson (who stunned the Republican primary field by winning in 2020) "seriously considering" a run for the US Senate seat. Notably, Robinson's interest in running gained more traction and attention from media outlets than the former Governor's announced run for the seat; however, the Lt. Governor has since removed his name from consideration.

See below for a list of announced candidates, and a list of those who are known to be considering a run for the open seat.

HOUSE BILL FILING DEADLINE

The House bill filing deadline was originally set out to be April 20th for non-finance bills and April 27th for finance-related bills; however, the House has decided to tweak their schedule. The House plans to extend their bill filing deadline to closer to Crossover, the day most bills must pass from one chamber to the other in order to be eligible for consideration for the remainder of session, which will be May 13th this year. Their new deadline will be May 4th for non-budget, non-finance bills and May 11th for finance-related bills. The Senate bill filing deadline for most bills has already passed; it ended on April 6th.
